

Helping grantmakers

improve the health of all people

Dear Colleague:

America's widening income gap has serious consequences for the country's health. Children are especially hard hit. When they grow up in poor families, they are more likely to have health problems. This affects their development and performance in school. In adulthood, they may still suffer from poor health, which affects their job prospects and raises the odds for their own children.

Health funders play a critical role in counteracting this destructive cycle. Non-health organizations, such as community development organizations and schools, have key parts to play too. At the community level, a growing interest in working across sectors offers new opportunities for health funders to join forces with other organizations that share their interest in health and positive community change. In 2014 Grantmakers In Health (GIH) began exploring this area, and we will continue to do so.

GIH board-organized receptions in their home cities were another development in 2014. The receptions were an opportunity for me to meet local grantmakers and to see their working environments. I was dramatically reminded of the complex challenges facing health philanthropy today. These visits helped GIH sharpen the programming we offer to help health funders learn, connect, and grow.

I invite you to read more about our work in 2014, designed to help grantmakers improve the health of all people and made possible thanks to the continued support of our esteemed Funding Partners.

Sincerely,
